Research indicates that people are spending 90 percent of their time indoors. According to the EPA, Indoor Air Quality is one of the top environmental health risks of our time.

The symptoms of poor indoor air are often referred to as tight or sick building syndrome and include a variety of complaints that can be associated with inadequately controlled indoor air parameters:

- Insufficient or excessive humidity
- Too low or too high temperature
- Improper air exchange and air flow rates
- Excessive amount of carbon dioxide and/or carbon monoxide
- Contamination of indoor air

The problems of indoor air quality typically originate from:

- Unbalanced heating ventilation and air conditioning (HVAC) system
- Poorly maintained air filters and blowers
- Contamination of air ducts and air handling units
- Penetration of airborne contaminants into the building

- Odor surveys and assessments
- Environmental related disease investigation
- Mold, bacteria and other microbiological assessments
- Investigative air quality assessment
- Detailed report of findings, conclusions and recommendations
